Abstract

An increasing number of developing countries are considering their highly qualified citizens living abroad as a potential asset for national development. Renewed policies are consequently developed in order to recover these expatriated talents. Besides the repatriation -return- option generally enacted in these policies with variable success, a second one has recently emerged: the diaspora option. It consists in the remote mobilization of intellectuals abroad and their connection to scientific, technological and cultural programs at home.

At the beginning of the 1990s, Colombia has started to systematically and consistently apply this option, through the creation of "the Colombian Caldas Network of Scientists and Engineers Abroad". This experience has been studied during the last 4 years by a Franco-Colombian research team. The article displays results of this study. It first contextualizes the diaspora option and the Colombian experience by putting it in historical perspective along with other policies designed to tackle the issue of professionals migration. It then describes what the S&T diaspora is in terms of actors and dynamics. The way it works through the Caldas network is presented by the analysis of three major aspects: the electronic list through INTERNET, the local associations (network's nodes) and some joint projects between diaspora and home community members. A concluding part draws the significance of the experience, its achievements as well as its limits, and suggests indicators and methods that could help develop it elsewhere.

1 - THE DIASPORA OPTION IN HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVES

The specificity of the diaspora option appears when compared to other policies. But it is not an isolated phenomenon without antecedents. Its emergency is the result of a gradual process.

1) Evolution of policies in regards to professionals migrations

The policies adopted by developing countries in regards to the migration of their highly qualified citizens may be classified and summarized in two basic approaches, according to the interpretation given to this phenomenon.
