The writer is a MASHAV agricultural development expert, currently stationed in Ethiopia. She holds a M.Sc. in Plant Protection from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and a M.Sc. in Forestry and Land Use from Oxford University. She has been a member of the Trilateral Project Management Unit in Ethiopia since 2009.

Over 10 years ago, the United Nations embarked on an enormous challenge: to tackle some of the world's most significant problems related to, among others, the eradication of poverty and hunger, education for all and equality. The Millennium Development Goals were not a mere declaration. They are expressions of our common humanity, our common vision for a better world. They provide a clear road map to help those most in need.

MASHAV is committed to development. It shares with other countries Israeli know-how and expertise in order to make a difference. The aspiration to excellence motivates the best researchers and farmers from different nations to mobilize all their effort and energy to develop new species, and to obtain crop yields of higher quality which contribute to the health and welfare of every person.

One of the main crises the world is facing today is climate change and its impact on agricultural activities and food production. The frequency of regular dry and wet periods is declining. Extreme weather conditions such as droughts and flooding are increasing. The variability of precipitation has increased, especially in the semi-arid regions that are characterized by irregular rainfall. Two important strategies to mitigate the effects of climate change are water management and making relevant technologies available to smallholder farmers.

In Ethiopia, 80% of the population is engaged in agriculture, which is the country's main source of employment, revenue and export earnings. In times of climate change when extreme weather conditions increase steadily, it becomes more and more important to secure food production by assuring irrigation for farmers.

Agricultural development is a priority for the Ethiopian Government. This commitment is being put into action through the Agricultural Development Led Industrialization (ADLI) strategy adopted in 1992 which sets irrigation as a major pillar to increased food production and food self-sufficiency for the country.

Experiences of irrigation and water development in Ethiopia over the past five decades suggested that several additional measures had to be taken to support farmer-managed small-scale irrigation projects in order to achieve viable agricultural development in the country and to improve food security. Since Ethiopian farmers are increasingly affected by extreme weather conditions such as droughts and flooding, small-scale irrigation becomes a major tool in adapting to climate change.
