

The Great Sand Hills: A Prairie Oasis

The Great Hills and Their History

The winding dunes that formed the crest of the grassy heights about 1000 years ago, at about 12,000 years ago, the area that would become the Great Sand Hills was a vast, open prairie that had grown along the 10-foot wide riverbed in the wake of the glaciers, rolling to green and yellowish. Grass, trees and animals adapted for an ice age life slowly disappeared, making possible for about 12,000 years ago, the people of the Ohio culture, ancestors and modern humans who lived roughly 12,000 to 10,000 years ago, left behind large quantities in evidence of their passing through the hills. There is their past disappeared to the hills today.

By about 10,000 years ago, the landscape dunes was becoming similar to that of today. A new group of grasses dominated the hills. A common grass in the hills had adapted to the advantage of the rapidly eroding prairie, and a new type of culture, one based on hunting, emerged. It would grow and flourish in the hills for the next 10,000 years.
